plus the Guam Adventist Academy, said she too is waiting for the green light.

She is especially anxious to get started because there were zero middle school sports last school year. That means seventh-graders have no school sports experience, and eighth-graders only have experience if they joined sports in the sixth grade.

Planning

It was announced late Thursday that Gov. Lou Leon Guerrero would be allowing the return of in-person learning, extracurricular activities and sports at the school's discretion.

The first-quarter sports were scheduled to have a full season, even with the recent announcement. But like the public high schools, second-quarter sports — called blocks — won't start until January. She said that all proposals are still subject to change.

She also said that her association is considering a two-week, practice-only mode for students to get them back into shape, with competitions to follow afterward.

Shepherd said that while proposed sports schedules have already been distributed, his board is considering switching from a double-round-robin-only format to a single-round format with playoffs and a title game.

"Middle schools don't normally have playoffs or championship games but who knows, maybe we will if the seasons get really short," he said.

Cardines-Finch said the same for her association. As also the athletic director for Astumbo Middle School, she too looks forward to a return to sports.

"It's something that keeps the kids motivated, and it's an aspect of socialization that they don't receive in a school classroom setting," she said. "Overall it's a good experience for them."
